

Notes from Deane Johnson

I'm sure this 1942 photo was taken after the outlet was moved north and the dam completed in 1941. It was really surprising to see the log and scattered rocks, so a lot of the development must have finished up gradually and continually changed with time. I know they still have to replace some of the smaller rocks from time to time, as people take them home. CCC records show that they planted at least 16 acres of trees there.
